REFLECTIONS

ON THE

Natural and Acquired Endowments

REQUISITE FOR THE STUDY of the LAW,

AND THE

Means to be used in the Pursuit of it.

By JOSEPH SIMPSON, Efq.

Omnes artes que ad humanitatem pertinent, habent quoddam commune vinculum, & quasi cognatione quadam inter se continentur.

Cicero pro Archia Poeta.

The FOURTHEDITION.

LONDON,

Printed for T. WALLER, in Fleet-fireet; and B. Tover, in Westminster-hall. MPCCEXV.

REFLECTIONS

SHTHO

Metucal and Acquired Ballowments

STID TO OF THE LAW.

Means to is used in the Partiet of it.

ENGLANCES HER ENGLAND

of all MIDLY DE DICATED to be not be

And Add the off Warrant

The Pack State Stand oblight M.

and opedsent Servin

Joseph Sungion.

VICE S SHOW I WE WAR TO SEE THE SECOND

TO THE RIGHT HONOURABLE

ROBERT,

serious mana have of others and

EARL OF NORTHINGTON.

Lord High Chancellor of Great-Britain,

antergraphen of reads the mana larger the wen who both and we common and the

THIS TREATISE

IS HUMBLY DEDICATED,

enters the good and see which they

By

His Lord(bip's most obliged,

that it was a part of which the formation

Twick de l'aliable to be quaished.

and obedient Servant,

Lincoln's lan,
June 1, 1764.

Joseph Simpson.

TO THE RIGHT HONOURABLE

TO THE STATE OF THE PARTY OF THE

EARL OF NORTHINGTON,

Lord High Chancellor of Great-Britain,

THISTREATISE

HUMBLY DEDICATED,

de Therma from their Lis Lordfuip's most obliged, and the frame of the slowly of the fact and obedient Servant, and to Vicalizant has standing such then insulatory sile or slagashing

then have done and whether it is nothing

Lincoln's danger and the corresponds well was lune to 1764.

June 1, 1-64. als and then objective are become ale

INTRODUCTION

IT hath long been a matter of complaint, that the laws of England are grown for voluminous, that the compass of a man's life will scarce suffice for the bare reading, much less for the apprehending and digesting them. Innoited a ed blue wastistieb

The fluctuations in property, which the revolutions in government, and the enlargement of trade and commerce, have introduced into this kingdom, will easily account for the alterations which have been made both in the common and statute laws, either as they were found productive of inconvenience, or insufficient to answer the good ends for which they might originally be designed.

Every subject of England is presumed to know the laws, by which he is to regulate his conduct, and for the violation of which he is liable to be punished. But however agreeable this presumption might be to the plainness and simplicity of the ancient common law, there is little reason to believe that it corresponds with the truth of the fact at present; on the contrary, the laws, by their number, their bulk, and their obscurity, are become almost a wilderness to the professors; and some have doubted whether it is possible to reduce them to a narrower compass. But whether there be room for fuch a doubt or not, this may fairly be prefumed, that the vast extent of a work of this nature, as it hath hitherto discouraged, will always continue to discourage any private person from attempting it. It feems univerfally agreed, that fuch an undertaking would be a national good; and one would naturally conclude from thence, that it might become a national concern. The building of bridges, and the amending of highways have always merited the attention of the public; and shall the way to the knowledge of the laws of our country be the only one that is left unpaffable?

The labours of many of the reporters of the common law have, no doubt, contributed to encrease its perplexity; for, instead of culling the choicest and most useful cases, and digesting them under proper heads, they have poured them upon the world crude and undigested as they were taken, and in such quantities as if they imagined that the greatness of their number would make amends for their want of weight.

Mr. Plowden, in the Prologue or Preface to his commentaries, tells us, "That in old time, as he had credibly heard, there were four reporters of our law-cales, who were chosen men, and had a yearly stipend for their labour from the drown, and they conferred all together at the making and setting forth the report; and their reports, for the number of reporters, and their approved learning, carried great credit, as it justly deserved." After which, he, with great modesty, apologizes for publishing a work, which will be read with pleasure by every professor of the law, so long as perspicuity and sound rea-foning are regarded.

It will be extremely difficult, if not impracticable, to reduce the vast body of the common law to a fystem; but the methodizing and reducing the acts of parliament to their proper heads, will not be attended with the same difficulty. It is our miffortune at present, that we are frequently obliged to have recourse to statutes passed in different reigns, and with different views, in order to gain a full and adequate knowledge of the point under confideration; and this fearch is formetimes as unfatisfactory as it is painful, it being no uncommon case to find, that acts of parliament taken into the construction of each other, instead of clearing and illustrating, ferve only to embarrafs and perplex the e é tove se commenta tans tella

The legislature have wisely appointed committees to enquire, from time to time, what acts are proper to be continued or repealed;

pealed; and if they were to add to the enquiry, how far they are proper to be incorporated into each other, the nation might hope that the statute laws, not withstanding their annual increase, would neither grow too numerous to be read, nor too intricate to be understood.

In other professions and sciences there are able and experienced tutors to direct the pupils in the pursuit of such studies as are most suitable to the sphere of action for which they are defigned.

But gentlemen embark in the law just as the caprice of their friends, or their own warm imaginations dictate, without ever considering the bent of their genius, or whether they are blessed with qualifications adapted to the nature of the profession.

And if their genius should happily coincide with the study, yet the difficulties they meet with, for want of a guide to point out the readiest way to knowledge, and to assist them in the pursuit of it, soon damps their imagination, and makes them sink into a supineness which renders them both useless to society, and a torment to themselves.

How different, in this respect, was the conduct of the ancient Romans, of whom a celebrated writer tells us, " Ergo apud majores nostros juvenis ale, qui foro & cloquentiæ parabatur imbutus jam domeftica disciplina, refertus honestis studiis deducebatur a patre vel a propinquis ad eum oratorem qui principem locum in civitate tenebat, hunc sectari hunc prosequi hujus omnibus dictionibus interesse, atque herculè sub ejusmodi præceptionibus juvenis, ille de quo loquimur oratorum discipulus sori auditor sectator judiciorum, eruditus & assuesactus alienis experimentis solus statim, & unus cuicumque cause par erat."

It cannot be thought upon without regret, that those who in this country are at the head of the profession, and, consequently, best qualified, from their know-ledge and experience, to communicate the necessary assistance, are too much immersed in their clients concerns to think of so barren and unprofitable an attempt.

The consciousness of my own want of abilities, when compared with theirs, deterred me from publishing the following treatise, until I considered that it might be of use to the younger professors and students of the law, and possibly be a means of exciting some abler hand to extend and improve upon the plan; in the execution of which I shall endeavour, with all possible conciseness and perspicuity, to point out the natural and acquired endowments requisite for the entrance upon this study, and the easiest and most proper means to be used in the pursuit of it: and if I have been so fortunate to chalk out a readier method for the attainment of legal know-lege than hath hitherto appeared, I flatter myself that the merit of the attempt will serve as a veil to cover such inaccuracies and imperfections as may possibly be observed in the course of the following Research.

place supposed to the confidence or desperation and confer

ert i de composition estados de la compositione estados de la composition de la compositione de la compositi area base to as as a short was a share numique de la company de la capación Com capación de Charanaminh équal de Chara el la company (a el secol de poe excundes capación de capación de la company de com de capación de cap

CHARLES AND ARREST CHARLES TO COMP

SHEELE WAS SON SON STORY OF BRITISH

Salan and ogg REFLEC.

not worth reading, at this day.

REFLECTIONS

人的语

seek in inequation who are codes enclosed www.iden of ON THE sinho wording

ENDOWMENTS

REQUISITE FOR

CONTRACTOR OF THE PARTY OF THE

The STUDY of the LAW.

in this garest description and the following as $1. regular of the first regression was the pair-

Of PERCEPTION.

ERCEPTION is that act of the mind by which we contemplate things offered to it, and from which we form our ideas; and in proportion as our perception is clear or imperfect, our ideas will be diftinct or confused.

Quickness of perception is the primary and diftinguishing characteristic of a great genius; and in some is so wonderful, that one would be apt to conclude with a late noble and most ingenious writer, " The Deity had imparted to them a larger pro-" portion of the ethereal spirit." But whether this quickness of perception be originally impressed upon the mind, or whether · 计维度 it arises from the texture of the brain, and the temperament of the body, it is most certain, that those who are endowed with it, have a natural superiority over the rest of mankind: and if at any time they have been outshone by men of lower capacities, either in the sphere of contemplation or of action, we must impute it to the misapplication or want of culture of so extraordinary a talent.

It is wonderful to see with what rapidity a genius of this kind advances in the pursuit of knowledge; his quickness of apprehension atones for his want of years, and his ideas are at once conceived and ripened or sw world ve bring into maturity.

If this faculty be a necessary preparative to other studies and other professions, much more so is it to the study of the law; and a slight attendance upon courts of judicature will convince us, that a great memory, intense application, and sound judgment, will not qualify a man to do complete justice to his client, unless he is endowed with a sufficient share of natural fagacity.

To see the consequences of a fact, and the drift of an argument at its first opening, and to reply immediately to an unforeseen objection, is the peculiar happiness of a quick quick apprehension; and indeed it is unnatural to imagine that he should be able to give a speedy solution of a doubt, who is not brought without length of time and great difficulty to understand the true state of the question.

Perception is to the mind what the eye is to the body; if the fight be dim or imperfect, the idea communicated through it will be dim and imperfect too. The nearfighted man must have the object brought close to his eye, and for that reason can see but a little of it at once, and requires much time and leifure to view all the parts fuecessively, before he can pronounce concerning its due fymmetry or proportion: in the fame manner, the man of flow capacity must have the question long before him, revolve it over and over in his mind, and confider and weigh each circumstance fingly, in order to form a judgment upon the whole; but the sharp-fighted, whether confidered corporeally or intellectually, take in the object with all its relations and confequences at first view; and so quick is their diffinguishing faculty, that the act of conception and judgment feem almost to be formed and executed at one and the fame instant. I have a learned judge in my eye, tioon. who.

who, without derogating either from his application, his memory, or his judgment, is perhaps the greatest instance of natural sagacity and quickness, that any age or nation hath produced; he apprehends the sact almost sooner than it can be stated, takes in the consequence of it at a glance, and perceives as it were by intuition.

But let no one imagine, because he is not blest with such talents as I have been describing, that therefore he wants qualifications adapted to the pursuit of the study of the law. The degrees of perception are as various as the degrees of sight, and many persons, though not so quick-sighted as the lynx, may yet be far distant from the darkness of the mole.

Wit, or the ready affemblage of a variety of pleafing yet corresponding ideas, is the natural and genuine production of a quick perception; but as this faculty is chiefly employed in raising up pleasing pictures and agreeable visions in the fancy, it hath not been held in much esteem among the grave and serious investigators of truth. One of our divines having frequently been reproached by a learned brother with the character of a wit, answered with a sarcasm, that he was too just to return this reproach upon upon his opponent; but that at least it might rebate the edge of his invectives, considering that it might have pleased God to have made him a wit too.

Some studies are more suited to a man of wit than others; but in the study and profession of the law, it hath its peculiar advantages. It may not, perhaps, be of so much use in the slow pursuit and search after truth, but then it will embellish and set it off to the best advantage; the too frequent abuse or misapplication of sine parts, hath given great latitude to question the judgment of the persons possessing them; but it does not follow from thence, that wit and judgment are enemies to each other; on the contrary, it only shews that a warm imagination may hurry the mind into great inconsistencies.

Wit is a vigorous plant, and will live in any foil, but will not equally thrive in all: When applied to the powers of the imagination of fancy, it agrees with Mr. Lock's well known description, or definition of it; but when applied to the profession of the law, it does not; for although it still retains its original power of a quick assemblage of various ideas, yet as these ideas are chiefly relative to disputes about property, and raise no pleasing pictures or agreeable visions in the fancy, wit borrows the name, and shines forth in the power of invention:

which, if not the greatest, is at least a very considerable qualification in a lawyer.

To conclude this chapter, perception is the inlet of knowledge; those endowed with it are in the fairest way of becoming eminent in any science or in any profession: with it a man may fail, but without it he can never be considerable.

mines hathy O R Willed O Me Hich

frequent about or milapplication of fire

As perception is the inlet of knowledge, memory is the storehouse in which it is laid up; and indeed it would be in vain to attempt to surnish the mind with necessary truths, unless there was a proper repository for them. In appropriate to the surnish the result and the surnish the

The advantage of an extensive memory will be best perceived by considering the ill consequences of its being treacherous or impersect. All the ideas which we gain, either by sensation or reslection, are no longer ours than we can remember and retain them: and one might with equal propriety attempt to fill a sieve by constantly pouring water into it, as to enlarge the the mind by study where the memory is naturally bad. We may read indeed with assiduity, and be pleased to think we are entertaining ourselves in an inosfensive manner, but no other use can be reaped from its for the traces of what we read will be no more perceptible than those which a bird leaves in its passage through the air.

But as there are some memories so defective as not to retain any thing, there are others to happy as to lose nothing.

Whatever knowledge they acquire, either sensible or intellectual, it remains as indelibly fixed upon their memories, as if it was engraven upon a rock. It is reported of Cyrus, that he could have faluted + all the foldiers in his army by their names; and Seneca tells us, that he himself by memory repeated two thousand names in the same order they were spoken to him. These facts, if true, shew to what a height the memory may be carried; and if this faculty be useful to a general and philosopher, how much more so must it be to a lawyer, when the very cases which are reported are perhaps more numerous than the foldiers in Cyrus's army, and are certainly more difficult to remember, there being fewer affociations of ideas to affift us in recollecting dhe only his officers: Lee Croposo.

It hath been a noted farcasm which Serjeant Maynard made use of to a junior barrister who presumed to contradict him, "Alas, young man, I have forgot more law than ever you read." But however the former might value himself upon the knowledge he had sorgot, and which from that moment ceased to be his, it would ill become any person of less authority to make a precedent of this case, or from thence imagine that any present reputation can be reaped from having sorgotten that knowledge, and those ideas, which were once treasured up in the memory.

The memory is undoubtedly a most useful repository; but it may be, and too frequently is, made a lumber-room instead of a storehouse; and in vain do we flatter ourselves that we have a memory of those ideas which we cannot recollect, or which, if we do recollect them, are so consused that they perplex and embarrass instead of explaining and illustrating a question.

There is a very striking difference between the quick perception of a man of wit, and the flow reflection of a man of memory: The former indeed does not lay in such a multiplicity of ideas as the latter, but then they they are always clear and ready for present use; and by a few mediums well chosen and readily applied, he will prove a truth, or detect a salshood, before the latter can have arranged or drawn out his ideas from the heap of consused learning with which they are overwhelmed.

It hath grown into a proverb, That great, wits have short memories. But this seems to be one of the vulgar errors which hath obtained in the world, and received countenance and patronage from those, who, sinding by experience that they had great memories but little wit, and believing that two such extraordinary faculties could never unite in the same person, very wisely laid it down as an axiom, That great wits have short memories.

Of JUDGMENT.

JUDGMENT is that faculty of the mind by which we are enabled to weigh and examine the nature of ideas, and to compare their agreement or disagreement with each other.

Patience and flowness of belief are the strongest marks of a sound judgment, and are no where more necessary than in the study and profession of the law: the seeming agreement which many cases have with each other, in point of circumstance, is too apt to mislead the warm imagination, and make us fancy there is an exact similitude, when, in reality, there is an essential difference between them.

C 2

fludy

This hastiness in judging is too often the consequence of a quick perception; and for one person of great genius that makes a figure in the law, there are ten fuccessful through a steadiness of temper, patience in fludy, and flowness in judging. The great and almost unavoidable misfortune of a genius is, that he furveys an object superficially, judges of it with precipitancy, and immediately ventures to form his conclusion. He catches the idea too quick to make a lasting impression, imagines himself master of the whole subject when he hardly comprehends a part, and hath been elegantly compared to an hafty fervant who posts away without his errand.

Impatience and a desire of novelty are the constant characteristics of a great genius; eager to be master of one subject, as eager to sly to another: He doth not indeed fall short of, but he over-shoots his mark; the sire of his imagination, like an ignis

ignis fatuus, misseads him from the true way to knowledge, not considering that he who keeps the direct road will sooner reach the end of his journey than he who frequently turns out of it for the sake of prospects.

From the too frequent abuse or misapplication of a quick perception, some have been apt to imagine that a quick perception and found judgment are never united in the fame person; but we have the happiness to see the observation contradicted by a living instance, who is not more eminent by his high station in the law, than for his great judgment and diffinguishing fagacity; he apprehends the facts with fuch clearness, retains every circumstance with such case, and weighs the ingredients of equity in so just a balance, that we are at a loss whether we should admire most the quickness of his apprehension, the strength of his memory, or the foundness of his judgment.

THE CHARLES AND A PARTY OF THE PARTY OF THE

rentalise en ellement et en lange duit The experiment de de lange duit of the lange de de lange Bullet e lange de lange

OF ELOCUTION.

LOCUTION, or the power of communicating our ideas to others with strength and perspicuity of expression, is a very effential qualification for a lawyer: and in vain will he be possessed of the various faculties I have before been confidering, if, at the same time, he is wanting in the gift of utterance. His quickness, indeed, may enable him to apprehend, his memory to retain, and his judgment to separate ideas, and compare their agreement or difagreement with each other; but in the midft of his abundance, he will still be poor, and like the owner of an immense treasure cast away upon a defart ifland, will view the riches he is possessed of with little complacency, while he is incapable of making use of or sharing them with others. Our ideas are the objects of our own understanding; but, in order to convey them to others, it is necessary to range them in a clear and easy method, and to clothe them with apt and proper words; and although fince the useful arts of writing and printing were invented, many persons who have attended more to thinking than speaking with with propriety, have been extremely ferviceable in communicating their ideas to the world, yet that way of doing it is but dead and lifeless, when compared with the quick and energetic force which we meet with in the mutual intercourse and exchange of language.

The power of expressing our sentiments with propriety, although of general use, is peculiarly ferviceable at the bar, where it is no uncommon thing for a person of fine parts and fluency of speech to outgo a man of superior knowledge but less oratory. The ready conception and easy delivery of the former, supplies his want of experience; and by speaking often, he at last comes to speak well; on the contrary, the latter, notwithstanding the variety of ideas with which his mind is furnished, hath the miffortune to express them in so obscure and uninteresting a manner, that they neither strike the imagination, nor convince the judgment; and all his expence of time and labour in the pursuit of knowledge, ferves only to place his imperfection and want of elocution in a more glaring light, and render him the subject of contempt, who in a different profession, or more retired life, might have defervedly been looked upon as an object of effeem.

I would not here be understood to confound the powers of eloquence with those of elocution; or to imagine that a person may not be a considerable speaker, because he happens to fall short of the beauties of a Cicero, or the strength of a Demosthenes.

The copious and almost inchanting powers of their oratory, were indeed of infinite fervice in harangues to the people, where it was the business of the speaker to captivate the passions, rather than convince the judgment. But whoever confiders the coldness of our climate, the genius of our people, and the nature of our laws and constitution, will foon be convinced that the man of sense and candour, who, like the counfel I have in view, states his facts with truth, concidencis, and perspicuity, and from thence draws the just and natural deduction, will have more weight and influence in a court of justice than any one can ever hope to arrive at by the mere pomp and splendor of Grecian or of Roman eloquence. police representation of a language from the control bandware spiritu progobi and prominent

2sda

that perfection confile: fome of the arts

tion and ellipity with this fludy of The COME have thought that learning, or a general infight into the liberal arts and foiences, is by no means an effential qualification for a lawyer; and I own there feems, at first fight, to be forme foundation for this opinion, in that passage of Lord Coke, where he fays, that causes which concern the lives and fortunes of the fubject are to be decided, not by natural reason, but by the artificial reason and judgment of the law; and it cannot be doubted, but that there have been persons, who, with little or no learning, have, by the mere help of this artificial reasoning, made no inconsiderable figure in the profession. But however fuccessful they may have been without it, it is very certain that with the affiftance which learning affords, they would have found the way to the knowledge of the law attended with less difficulties and fewer embarraffments : for, notwithstanding all the boasted declarations that the common law of England is the utmost perfection and refinement of human reason, it will require a great degree of fagacity, and many preparatives, to find out wherein 6119 that perfection confifts: fome of the arts and sciences have a very intimate connection and affinity with this study. The ufefulness of grammar, rhetoric, and logic, are obvious at first fight; geometry will greatly contribute to an habit of attention. and help a man to reason closely and to the point; and daily experience shews the advantage of being ready in figures and calculations: chronology and history, particularly that of our own country, point out the times of the most material changes and alterations in the common law, and the true political reasons on which they were founded WNeither would I wish the ftudent to be fo ignorant in geography as a certain lawyer, now dead, and of whom, the otherwise very eminent in his profesfion, there is left the following anecdote: A fea-officer happening to speak of his ship's being at quarentine, "Where doth Quarentine lie, fays the lawyer? I know it is an island, but cannot immediately recollect in what latitude." Ethics, or the knowledge of moral duties, is indifpenfably necessary to a lawyer; for the positive laws and customs of any country not being able to provide for all the variety of cases and disputes which must necessarily asife, with regard 29000

gard to property, we must frequently recur to the immutable laws of nature for the folution of many doubts and perplexities: Classical learning contributes much to refine fentiments and embellish the file and poetry and oratory have fo near an alliance, that whoever hath a true tafte for the grandeur, the dignity, and fublimity of the former, and is not deficient in the powers of elocution, will have gone a great way towards thining as an orator and and

Topics of argument arise from every science; and the more large and comprehenfive his knowledge is, the further will the student see into the depth and reason. of the law. But ufeful as it may be, let him take care left the thirft of general knowledge hurry him too far from his particular fludy; here his views must ultimately terminate; and whatever thill he may have acquired in other sciences, must still be made subservient to his proficiency in this; and if at any time he enters upon other pursuits, of no immediate connection with his profession, he must nfider them not as a bufinefs, but a relexation. And now supposing the student to be furnished with a proper share of intellectual and acquired endowments, and caragic that that he hath no dislike or aversion to this study; I shall proceed to offer a few resections upon the means best suited to attain his end, and whatsoever dissiculties he may meet with in the road, let him animate himself with the thoughts, that there is no study or employment wherein his service to the community will be so conspicuous, or from the practice of which he hath so fair a prospect to raise his reputation, advance his fortune, and aggrandize his family.

D 2

Of an UNIVERSITY EDUCATION,

hanky his knowledge by the faraher will THE great propentity which youth naturally have to pleasure and amusement, and the many incitements and allurements which are added to it, from the freedom and liberty too commonly attendant on a college life, hath induced fome persons of good understanding to consider the ferving of a clerkship as a better preparative for the severe and laborious fludy of the law, than all the extensive learning and polite literature, which the fludent may have an opportunity of acquiring by an university education : and although it must be owned that a love of company, and tafte for diversions, are too often contracted there; Make

there; yet we must consider that not the fault of the place, but of the man and to deprive a person of the best means of improvement, merely through a fe that he should neglect, or make an improper use of them, is to run into a certain abfurdity to avoid an uncertain inconve nience for whether the fludent make choice of the profession of the law thro's natural warmth of temper, or from a cool reflection upon the great advantages which refult from it, he will not be fo imprudent to fuffer the charms of liberty, the love of pleasure, or a taste for polite literature, to diffipate his thoughts, or hurry him into a neglect of fuch means as are most conducive to his main end and defign pits airmest

By serving a clerkship, indeed, under the eye of a steady and prudent master, he will in some measure be kept clear of the temptations I have been mentioning, and may early gain an insight into practice, and an habit of industry. But then his mind, unused to expatiate, will be confined to the narrow limits of legal knowledge; and the painfulness of acquiring it, for the want of the necessary helps which are drawn from learning, will go near to damp his imagination. Add to this, that there is scarce any advantage in ferving a clerkship, which may not be reaped by the student, without breaking too much into the time allotted by him for his course of studies and attendance upon courts; for after he hath finished his college education, and furnished his mind with a large and comprehensive knowlege, and begun feriously to apply himself to the study of the law, he may, under the guidance and directions of fome able and experienced attorney, bestow his leifure hours to confiderable advantage by going through the forms of business, and learning so much of the practice as to give him a general notion of the conduct of a cause from its first process to its final determination. Lob into been them sirked ovid

Of STUDY.

WHOEVER considers the vast variety of disputes which daily arise in relation to property, and how voluminous the laws are grown, which were made to protect and guard the rights of the weak against the unjust encroachments of the strong, will easily be convinced of the great necessity there is for an unwearied diligence and application in the pursuit of so complicated a study. The revolutions of government, and fluctuations of human affairs, occasion frequent and pecchary alterations in the common and flature laws of this kingdom; and a person must be deeply read and acquainted with both, and the various reasons and policy upon which fuch alterations were founded, who flatters him felf with the hope of thining in the first rank of fo ufeful a profession , but it is not necessary to be deeply read, that a man should be constantly poring upon his books fuch a practice will defeat the very end aspires at, by loading the memory with a number of useless lingularities, and differen ing the judgment to fuch a degree 46 to bes get a confution in our ideas, and create an entire disgust and abhorrence of so painful and laborious an employmentana ast knottab

All that I mean by it is, that a student should let no day slip without making some improvement in his profession; and if at any time he is obliged to pass a whole day in such amusements or avocations as are totally inconsistent with such an application, he should, as the emperor Titus Vest passan did upon a better occasion, consider that day as absolutely lost. Much study is a wearssomeness to the sloth, and therefore we must be upon our guard, less a too eager defire of outstripping others, carry us in the pursuit beyond those bounds which reason dictates. Excess in every thing is to be avoided; and he who impairs his constitution, and weakens his intellectual faculties by incessant application to this fludy, will find that he hath paid a greater price for the knowledge of the law, than the purchase of it deserved : it is not here as in other fciences; which intermix the pleasant with the profitable; and amuse the imagination at the same time they improve the judgment: the law is a dry and unpleasing subject; but dry and unpleasing as it may be on our first onset, it will every day become less so; and if we are content to make our advances in it by fuch eafy gradations, as are suitable to the nature of the study, and the time of life we enter upon it, we shall find the prospect open and improve upon us: and barren as it might once feem, shall reap such pleasure in obferving the necessary regulations it lays down for the due order and government of fociety, and fuch emoluments to ourselves as will make ample amends for the many difficulties we meet with in the road; and even these difficulties may be greatly lessened by the proper choice of our feafons and hours hours of study: indeed nature alone scenas to point out the morning for that purpose, because the body being refreshed by sleep, and recovered from the satigues of the preceding day, is then in its full strength and vigour: and who knows not by experience, that if the organs of the body are at any time indisposed, the mind will be incapable of a due exertion of its intellectual faculties?

eager

Of the CHOICE of BOOKS.

THERE is scarce any thing of greater importance to a student, than a proper choice of such books as will lead him by the most easy but sure gradations into the knowledge of so perplexed and intricate a science as the law.

I do not mean by this, that his collection should consist of such only, it being necessary that he should, before his entrance upon this study, be surnished with the whole course of the law, to which he may occasionally refer: for how is it possible for a man to be an expert artist, without the apparatus or implements suitable to his employment? It were much to be wished that the common law could be reduced to a

E

fystem

fystem; but as no fingle person is equal to the attempt, there is little probability of our ever feeing the completion of so vast an undertaking. Something hath been done towards it by Mr. Wood, in his Institute; and notwithstanding the just contempt and ridicule, which a most ingenious and entertaining writer hath, in the character of Parson Barnabas, thrown upon those who fancy themselves complete lawyers merely because they have read that author, we must not immediately conclude that work to be without its merit; for, thort and compendious as it is, it gives the student a general infight into the law, and that in terms fo plain and intelligible, that we are at a loss whether we should admire most, the happy method in which he ranges, or the perspicuous manner in which he treats, the different branches of so extensive a subiect. en ministration de la contraction de

Upon this plan the student may enlarge, by comparing it with the authorities he refers to, particularly Fitzherbert's Natura Brevium, which, in the opinion of a Judge no less remarkable for his extensive knowledge than his great politeness and humanity, is one of the most useful inlets into the nature of actions, and the reason of the practical part of the common law: along with Wood, he may properly read Finch upon the Common Law, and Mr. Justice Wright's learned Treatife upon Tenures; and by the time he hath perufed these writers, and made careful extracts from the feveral authors which they occasionally cite, the student will find his fund of knowledge confiderably enlarged, and be enabled to read with some degree of pleasure, the antient reports, and comments upon the law, and which, but for this previous affiftance, he would scarce have looked upon without difguft; and of these the Lord Coke's First and Second Institutes, claim his chief and most assiduous attention; the vein of profound learning which runs through these works, shews the vast industry, fagacity, and judgment of the writer; and Littleton's Tenures, valuable as they are had never been held in fuch esteem, had he not fallen under the confideration of fo able a commentator; and although abridgments have been faid to be of no use but to those who make them, yet I would venture to recommend Serjeant Hawkins's Compendium of the First Institute as a very useful and necessary guide in the perusal of it; and the rather as he is very careful in point-E 2

193

the

ing out such parts as are now become obsolete and antiquated. By thus singling out the First and Second, I would not be understood to exclude the reading the Third and Fourth Institutes; but as it is more eligible for the student to begin with the acquisition of that knowledge which will be of the most real and immediate use, I would advise him to postpone the reading of those parts of his work till he is thoroughly conversant, and well read in the more necessary branches of the profession.

In reading Lord Coke's Institutes, there will be found frequent references to that author's Reports; and the fludent will reap much greater advantages by comparing them as they are referred to, than by reading them in the confused manner in which they lie. Besides, the Report will contribute to illustrate and explain the Institute, as that explains and illustrates the text: after, or rather along with thefe, I would recommend Plowden's Commentary to the Audent's careful perufal; and if he hath any relish for strong reasoning and clear expression, he will find his trouble in learning the law French made amply amends for, by the knowledge he will acquire from that most accurate and judicious performance. But

But as the great body of the law is in perpetual fluctuation, it will be very proper for the student, after he hath made himself master of these valuable treasures of ancient knowledge, to read the latest and most authentic Reports, to wit, Lord Raymond, Salkeld, Carthew, Levinz, Saunders, and Sir John Strange; for the ancient Reports, however found and accurate in their reasoning, may still lead him into a multitude of errors, many of the determinations being altered by later authorities, and a number of distinctions introduced, unknown to the plainness and simplicity of former ages. And as the positive and common laws of this kingdom have been found productive of great hardinip and inconvenience in particular cases, the Court of Equity hath frequently interpoled, and redressed the fame agreeable to the principle of natural justice: and as many of the cases have been collected, and the grounds upon which the mitigation of the rigour of the law was founded; they are now become a confiderable part of the rule of property: and although the Lord Chancellor is not fo strictly bound by former determinations as the Judges are at com-common law, yet it is very rarely he departs from them without urgent reason, or apparent necessity; and whoever expects any uncommon reputation, must have a thorough knowledge both of law and equity, they being now so interwoven with each other, that there is scarce any affair of consequence which in its progress doth not undergo the disquisition of both jurisdictions. The necessity, therefore, of reading the best Reports, both in law and equity, is manifeft; and by comparing them together they will reflect a mutual light upon each other. The common law Reports too often confift of bare resolutions, unaccompanied with the reasons upon which they are founded: the Reports in equity, on the contrary, are very diffuse and extensive, and give larger room for the exertion of the rational faculties, as being less fettered with the chains of custom, precedent, or authority.

It may serve as a relaxation to the student from the severe study of the common law, carefully to peruse Peer Williams and Vernon's Reports, Precedents in Chancery, and a Collection of Cases in the time of Lord Chancellor Talbot; which last, though published without a name, will always be a credit a credit to the ingenious compiler. By this intercourse and exchange of studies, the student will see the analogy between law and equity, and be in some measure able to ascertain and distinguish their respective boundaries. And that such a knowledge is of the utmost consequence to a lawyer, will be very evident to any person who considers the many judgments which are recovered by the strict rules of the common law, of which a Court of Equity will not suffer the parties to take advantage.

In perusing the Reports I have been mentioning, it will be of great fervice to the student to give an exact attention to the rules and maxims, both of law and equity, which are as it were the pole-ftar to direct his way through the fea of difficulties he will meet with. Noy's Maxims, Lord Bacon's Elements of the Common Law, and Francis's Maxims of Equity, will much affift him in making his collections; and if he takes care to illustrate his maxims with proper cases, he will find the maxims fpontaneously occurring upon every occafion; and that it will, at the same time, by an affociation of ideas, help him to recollect some case or other in which its authority hath been admitted and allowed.

I would

I would not mention the Statutes as books proper for his reading; their valt bulk and annual increase renders it impossible to go through them all; therefore the student may content himself with being master of such as make any considerable alteration in the common law, and refer to the rest occasionally.

There are many Reports besides those I have mentioned, particularly Lord Dyer, Yelverton, Pollexfen, Croke, Vaughan, and Hobart, which are well worth the student's perusal; but as too much reading of the common law Reports will rather burthen than improve the understanding, it must be left to his discretion either to go through the whole of those Reports, or to refer to them occasionally; being well fatisfied that a few of the most approved writers well read, and thoroughly digested, will be of more real fervice to the student. than the whole course of the law run over in an hafty and superficial manner. a magar celas regord el and some and one and the street and their apple township a Louising good difficulty

theme cale or the in which the each

OF ATTENDING COURTS.

THE next thing I would recommend to the student, is a diligent and constant attendance upon the courts of justice; and one would think there was no need for such a recommendation, since curiosity alone incites persons, bred up in other sciences and professions, to hear causes tried with which they have no connection, and questions of property discussed, in the resolution of which they have no interest.

Whether this arises from the love of truth, the desire of novelty, or an admiration of the beauties of oratory, it is certainly a strong inducement for the student to attend upon those debates, which not only afford entertainment to him in common with others, but at the same time contribute to his improvement in the profession he is designed for: it is easy to observe how much stronger an impression is made upon the memory by hearing a fact stated, and the consequences of it deduced in a course of argument at the bar, than by coldly reading the Report. There is something striking in the look, the action, and the expression of the speaker; we do not confider ourselves merely as spectators, but as actors, and wish for the success of that party in favour of whom a regard for justice, or hatred of oppression, directs our in-And if strangers to the law clinations. shall attend to these debates with care and affiduity, shall those who are designed for the profession, either absent themselves through indolence, or attend to them with fuch apparent indifference, as if they thought they were of no use?

F

In the course of an argument, the student hears the most abstruse points opened and enlarged upon, with fuch beauty and vivacity of expression, that his imagination is warmed, and he glows with ambition to become a speaker; besides, the object of disquisition is surveyed in every light, and the difficulties attending the enquiry are fo fully elucidated, that he must have a very slow perception, who cannot apprehend the reasons of the determinations.

Matters of consequence and speculation may not happen to arise in the common and daily course of proceedings, but mat-ters of practice and improvements will; and the smallest acquisition of legal knowledge is by no means to be confidered as a matter of contempt. journed, blood lener A trial

A trial at bar, or a special argument may seem indeed more worthy the student's attention, and inslame him with the hope that he may one day shine as an advocate in a cause of equal nicety and importance; but let him not from thence be tempted to neglect or think meanly of the inserior branches of knowledge, particularly the practice of the courts, which, low and trisling as it may seem, hath been very instrumental in promoting the rise of some of the greatest and ablest men in the profession.

OF TAKING NOTES.

THE memory, even where it is the most perfect, cannot long retain the traces of what we hear; and, therefore, a constant attendance upon courts of Justice will be of little service to any but those who have sagacity enough to distinguish, and industry to write down so much of each sact, argument, and determination, as may be necessary for their suture use.

The advantage, indeed, of doing it is so apparent, that no student is unfashionable enough to attend a court of justice without his note-book, however indolent he may be in his use or application of it: and were we but to see the desective manner in which the notes of cases are too generally taken, we should be apt to imagine that the doing it was either a matter of no confequence to a student, or else that nothing was said which could merit his attention.

F 2

The reason of this general neglect seems to be, that every one thinks it an easy matter to take down what he hears, and consequently that little reputation can be reaped from an advantage which he shares in common with so many others. But this we shall find to be a mistake, and that the taking notes may justly be considered as a proper and noble exercise of our intellectual faculties.

The art of writing short-hand contributes greatly to the taking notes with accuracy; but the misfortune is, that the practisers of it are too apt to exercise their pen rather than their judgment; and finding that they can keep pace with the speaker, take down every word that is said, without being at the pains of distinguishing the circumstantial from the essential parts of an argument. Such a one may possibly make amends for his carelessness in collecting the dross with the gold, by afterwards fifting the one from the other; but this being a work of labour and judgment, it is great odds that he who takes notes with fo little discernment, will bestow as little in digefting them. But we must not from hence conclude, that the art of thort-hand is an hindrance either to the memory or the judgment; it is only the abuse and sole reliance upon it, which is to be condemned, there being no real necessity for a short-hand writer to be prolix in his notes; though it is very difficult for a perfon unskilled in it, to avoid being obscure. The latter, indeed, will reap greater improvements from the act of taking notes, short and imperfect as they may be, than a mere short-hand writer; for, by a constant exercise of his rational faculties, he will acquire an habit of discerning the substantial part of an argument, and by that means store his mind with ideas instead of words: but the former hath a peculiar advantage; for his quick and compendious way of writing will enable him to take the very words where they are necessary to be taken; and where they are not, will afford him leisure to abridge and reduce the state of the argument to as small a compass as is confistent with perspicuity. But notwithflanding standing the great usefulness of the art, the short-hand writer must be very cautious, left the ease and facility of doing it draw him in to be a mere transcriber: who, after having taken down every word of a debate with the most literal exactness, comes away very well fatisfied with himfelf, though he is totally ignorant both of the state of the case and the reasons of the resolution. Very few take notes with that accuracy and exactness which is necessary to render their collections of use, being too apt to run into prolixity or obscurity; but of the two, the former is least prejudicial, it being more pardonable to tire our patience, than mislead our understanding. After the student's attendance upon court, he may very usefully employ his time in weighing and comparing the reasons of a determination with the several authorities which are occasionally referred to, and in expunging the superfluities in which a copiousness of expression is too apt to involve an argument; and by this means he will render his collections no less valuable for their conciseness than their weight. And in digesting a note, I would recommend to him not only the excellent model which Sir John Davis hath given in his Report of fome some Cases and Matters in Law, adjudge in Ireland; but the method pointed out by Mr. Plowden, in the Cafe of Throgmorton against Tracy and Nicholson; of which he fays, " He had made a fummary Report, uttering together the effect, as he had conceived, of all that was urged on the one part and on the other, and so likewise of what was faid by the judges, without recital of their arguments word by word." And his reason for so doing is strong and conclusive: " For, I have found (fays he) few arguments so pure, in which there was no refuse; and therefore I thought it better to utter the pure only, and omit the refuse, then and yet thinking that form of Reports to be the best."

OF COMMON-PLACE BOOKS.

THE most assiduous attendance upon courts, joined with an unwearied application to study, however promising at first view, are by no means sufficient to constitute a lawyer: by the help of those indeed the student will make a great prosiciency both in the theory and practice of the law; but the difficulty will be to retain so valuable an acquisition, and apply it as often as he hath occasion, to present use; some indeed are bleft with fo tenacious a memory; and so quick a power of recollection, that they want little or no extrinsic affistance; their fund of ideas, like a rich bank, is always ready to answer at first fight the largest draughts which can be made upon it: but the generality of mankind are not fo happy, and therefore have been obliged to feek out for artificial help to cover the defects, and supply the absence of these extraordinary endowments; to this we may ascribe the origin of common-placing, or making extracts from approved authors, and ranging them under their proper titles, a practice which from its usefulness hath much obtained and been deservedly countenanced and approved by the greatest and ablest men of the profession: and had no improper use been made of the valuable collections of this kind, which at different times have been offered to the public, we probably should never have heard of that well-known farcaim, " Abridgments are of no use but to the makers." But the misfortune is, that we had rather jump than climb into knowledge; and through a vain defire of acquiring it at the least expence of time and labour, too frequently make a shameful wafte waste of both; for instead of reading the best and most authentic Reports, where we should meet with a copiousness of reasoning, and perspicuity of expression, we fatisfy ourselves with some obscure abridgments, and by endeavouring to contract our way of study, become as superficial in our knowledge as we were compendious in the fearch and pursuit of it. It is much to be feared that this abfurd; but feeming expeditious way of becoming learned, is growing universal; and that not only the students of the law, but the proficients in the other arts and sciences, instead of reading the best and most approved authors, and making full and ufeful collections from them, will fit down contented with the thort and imperfect fleetches which are made by others, and then plume themselves upon that small pittance of knowledge which is to be acquired from the reading an abridgment, or the perufal of a dictionary. I would not from hence be understood to mean, that abridgments are of no use; the great repute and authority in which Roll's Abridgments of the Common Law, and the Abridgment of Cases in Equity, by a judicious barrister, are universally held, sufficiently manifest the contrary; oloris.

四村五年,

contrary; and if the student, during the course of his reading the best authors, only bestows the trouble of comparing them with these Abridgments, he will easily fill up and illustrate such parts as seem any way obscure or desective; and by daily extracting the substance of his own notes, and ranging them under the same titles with these authors, he will, in process of time, be master of such a common place book as he may assuredly sely upon for the solution of the many doubts and questions which will naturally occur to him in the course of his profession.

OF DRAWING PLEADINGS. TO SALES TO SALES

It is not impossible but the student, if he hath fine parts and a volubility of expression, may soon fancy himself qualified to amuse a court, bassle a witness, or confound a jury; but however extraordinary his endowments may be, it will be very difficult to find a proper opportunity to display them to advantage, or to convince the world of the extent of his genius, or the fire of his capacity. Some, indeed, have writen like meteors, and at once commanded the attention of mankind; but these these prodigies are rather to be wondered at than expected; and therefore, it will be incumbent upon the student, how partial foever he may be to his own abilities, to take every measure which may give him a reasonable and well-grounded affurance of faccefs; and among those there is none for likely to promote it, as his being a special pleader or a draughtiman; and however the petulance of wit, or warmth of imagination, may tempt the hafty and unthinking youth to look upon the persons who are bred up to fuch a scene of drudgery, as no better than hewers of wood, or drawers of water, he will one day be sensible, that to fix a plea, or to fettle a draught with accuracy, is the readiest introduction to bufinefs, and the furest inlet to reputation. The proper time for acquiring this ufeful knowledge, is before his call to the bar: for although nothing is more common in practice, yet nothing can be more abfurd, than to fet up a trade before we have learned it, or to embark in a profession without the necessary preparatives.

The drawing of pleadings in Chancery contributes much to fix the attention and improve the judgment; while the variety of facts which offer themselves to the consideration, and from which ingredients of equity are to be raised, gives room for the exercise of our most extensive faculties; and it hath been owing to the pride, the ingratitude, or ignorance of the professors, if at any time the bufiness of a draughtsman hath been confidered as an object of contempt. To be capable of attending to a long feries of complicated facts, and to survey the whole train of consequences resulting from them, is a talk equal to the largest capacity; and to state and range those facts in fuch a clear and perspicuous method, as to convince the judgment of their truth, agreement, and confistency with each other, which is the great characteristic of a complete draughtsman, is a work not beneath the attention of the ablest of the profesfion! And notwithstanding the great deference which is paid, and the greater rewards which are given, to those who happen to be bleffed with the power of elocution, still the draughtsmen are to be confidered as the master-builders; for they are the architects who form the plan, and lay. the foundation for all those beauties with which eloquence charms the ear, and captivates the judgment : and if the foundation happens to be bad or defective, the QUIUT. whole whole superstructure and affemblage of ornaments, grand and magnificent as they may seem, at once tumble into ruin.

oladio

The art of special pleading, so called from the substance of the defence being specially stated, is so little understood, that it is no wonder if it be generally decried; it being but too natural for us to flight those branches of knowledge which we either want industry or capacity to attain. It cannot, indeed, be doubted, but that it is a dry and unentertaining study; and to this in great measure may be attributed the almost universal dislike of it. Some indeed have gone fo far as to think it should be totally abolished; and Lord Coke, at the fame time he shews the necessity of being skilled in it, affigns such a reason for it as renders but little honour to the practice; for in his Comment upon the 534th fection of Littleton, he is pleased to say, " When I diligently confider the course of our Books of Years and Terms from the beginning of Edward III. I observe that more tangling and questions grow upon the manner of pleading, and exceptions to form, than upon the matter itself, and infinite causes loft or delayed for want of good pleading; therefore (fays he) it is a necessary part of a good common lawyer, to be a good prothonotary." And although it is impossible not to agree with him in his conclusion, vet it is much to be lamented, that the rights and properties of the subject should be left upon such a precarious footing, as to extort a confession from that great lawyer, that an infinity of causes are lost or delayed, for want of good pleading. Whether this grievance can be redreffed without the introduction of some greater evil in its room, seems a question worthy the attention of the legislature; if it can, the trial of property will be freed from many of the difficulties and embarrassments with which it bath been too long entangled. If it cannot be remedied without substituting in its stead a method productive of equal or greater inconvenience, I would then enferce, to the utmost of my power, that memorable piece of advice, which Littleton gives, " Know, my fon (fays he) that it is one of the most honourable, laudable, and profitable things in our law, to have the science of well pleading in actions real and personal; and therefore I counsel thee especially to employ thy courage and care to learn this." And the result of the method Burtline wire bidding to william pa

burn

of the CROWN-BAW

HE crown-law, although composed of the common and flature laws of the kingdom, is become fo confiderable a branch of both, as to merit a particular confideration. The barefaced and audacious manner in which the lives and properties of the honest, industrious subjects are daily trampled upon and invaded by the violence and rapine of the idle, profligate, and abandonedy thews the necessity of those pe-nal laws, which the wisdom and expericince of former ages have established for the prefervation and peace of the community. The due and proper execution of these laws is a matter of the utmost confequence to the public, and the acquiring a competent knowledge of them is of no fmall importance to the student: for as it is most probable that he will make his first appearance at the fellions, or upon the circuit, nothing will contribute fooner to his introduction into bufiness, than the notion of his being thoroughly conversant in the crown-law: to this end he must be very affiduous in his attendance upon the King's Bench, by which means he will not only learn risty the the practice of the court, but procure a collection of such a number of cases, with regard to the settlements of paupers, as will make him appear at the fessions to considerable advantage, and raise his reputation in the country where he happens to refide, to a higher pitch than would be easily imagined. It will not be amifs also, if the student attends upon fuch trials at the Old Bailey as are any way remarkable for their importance or particularity; by which means the practice of the crown bar will grow easy and familiar to him, and he will gain a better infight into those laws upon which his fellow-subjects depend for the fecurity of their lives and properties of And however ignominious the name and character of a mere Old Bailey Counsel may justly appear to him; he will find by experience, that the method here laid down will forward his advangement as a lawyer, without the least derogating from his character as a gentleman. In the course of these attendances, I would recommend to his perusal Lord Chief Justice Hale's most accurate History, Mr. Serjeant Hawkins's learned Treatife of the Pleas of the Crown; and Mr. Burn's Justice; and if he reads them with that care and attention which they they deserve, he will soon be enabled to make a considerable figure in that sphere of action which is the first province of a young lawyer; and as ambitious as he may be of the reputation which is to be acquired in the disquisition of a nice and complicated question, relating to property, he must still remember, that the life and liberty of the meanest subject are of much higher value and estimation in the eye of reason, as well as law: and that the talents of a Cicero were never more conspicuously exerted than in the protection of injured innocence, or the conviction of abandoned guilt.

OF COMPANY

IT is an observation of the great Lord Bacon, That reading maketh a full man, conference a ready man, and writing an exact man. By reading, we enlarge our fund of ideas; by composing or writing, we learn to range them with accuracy and propriety; and conference gives us a happy facility in conveying them to others. The charms of society are, indeed, of themselves so engaging, that he must be something above or below humanity who is able to result them; but pleasing as they are, the fludent must consider them not merely as an agreeable relaxation, but as an excellent: means of improvement. To this end he should choose for his companions, fuch whose turn of mind and bent of inclination are most correspondent with his own, and the great end he hath in view. Out of these a little society may be formed, one or more of whom may be daily detached to take notes in the feveral courts of juffice. and may bring the fruit of their respective Tabour into the common flock; in which the whole fociety being partakers, each of them will reap a larger harvest of practical and useful knowledge, than it is possible for any fingle person to acquire by the mere efforts of his own application: add to this, that the comparing the notes they have taken, and communicating them to each other, will not only contribute to the corredness of the reports, but be a spur to the industry and emulation of the competitors; each of whom will be ambitious of thewing that he hath more accuracy in taking, or more judgment in digesting his notes, than the rest of his fellowlabourers. And as the ancient practice of mooting in the inns of court is now, like many other uleful cultoms, become obfolete includ.

lete and antiquated, it will be of feivice to this little foolety to establish a jurisdice tion amongst themselves, analogous to the practice of fuperior courts, where they may difplay the first dawnings of their genius, and learn to deduce confequences from facts; and by being early inured to the difquifitions of legal questions, they will imperceptibly acquire a talent of reasoning, and habit of expressing themselves with justness and propriety. Thus fraught with the intellectual and acquired endowments T have been describing, and modelly confcious of their abilities, they will, upon their first appearance at the bar, behave with such a decent and becoming steadiness as to give the world a happy impression in their favour, and raise a general expectation of their future rife, and man don At a 12512 earns, will adopt a green on the in the pro-

of DIVERSIONS

As the law is generally allowed to be a fevere and unentertaining study, it cannot be wondered at, if the student sometimes requires a relaxation from it; but allowable as it may be, to unbend the mind by agreeable amusements, he must not dwell upon them too long, lest they should diffipate his ideas, and weaken his habit of industry; the luxury of the prefent age hath refined upon all the preceding ones, both in the number and variety of its . entertainments, and which, if they do not corrupt, at least enervate the mind, and render it impatient of any task that is attended with pains and difficulty; and it were well if this unbounded thirst after pleasure confined itself to those alone, whose opulence renders time of no value, and whose rank places them above censure; but it is greatly to be feared, that the diforder is growing epidemical, and that those who are bred up to the rigid employment of the law, are at least in danger of being infected by it. The mischiefs arising from this almost universal passion, are very great; the too eager pursuit of pleasure diverts the student's attention from its proper object, the law; and he who is a bad economist of his time, will hardly fail of being a bad economist of his fortune: and it is not difficult to imagine, that he who fquanders away both the one and the other in an useless and unprofitable manner, will foon be in too uneasy a situation to make a progress in that study, where there is a constant occasion for cool thinking and unwearied wearied application. I would not here be understood to exclude the student from a moderate share of diversions, but only guard him against such as have a natural tendency to impair his fortune, or wound his character. Those diversions are to be preferred, which pleafe the imagination, at the fame time they improve the judgment; and in this number a well wrote play may possibly be ranked, even in the opinion of the feverest judges; here the student may indulge a rational and wellgrounded delight in beholding the passions represented by the Roscius of our age, with fuch a dignity of action, and power of expression, as bespeak the orator as well as player; and although the student cannot be too cautious of contracting the the-atrical gesture, which is so widely different from that which is proper for the bar, yet he may, by a strict observance of the perfon I am describing, learn to utter his sentiments with fuch propriety, that the action may be fuited to the word, and the word to the action; and which, if not the only, is at least a very distinguishing, qua-lification of an orator.

Henrealion for soot then ince this un-

The CONCLUSION

T is an observation founded upon experience, that mankind are too apt to form an opinion of our abilities from the figure we make at our first entrance upon the flage of life; and, notwithstanding this way of judging is in its nature extremely fallible, it will be very difficult to remove the prepoffestions which are thus imbibed, as the generality of mankind are much more ready to entertain, than to part with a fettled opinion. The attending to this observation may, perhaps, be of some use to the student in determining the proper time for his call to the bar, which, however superficially it may have hitherto been regarded, is a matter of no small importance to his welfare. I don't hall facil

It seems, indeed, impossible to lay down a general rule, in a case where the circumstances are so widely different. The abilities and industry of one man, and his means and opportunity of improvement, are frequently so much beyond another of the same age, that the sormer might appear in public with applause, while the latter, by so doing, would only become the object of contempt. To know ourselves in a moral fense, is a mark of true wildom and to know the force and extent of our powers and abilities, is the first step to wards appearing to advantage, and is the true criterion of the time in which our call to the bar will be attended with reputation: and however fond we may be of the advantages which refult from an early call, we must still remember, that seniority gives but a painful and thort-lived pre-eminence. unless it is accompanied with those real claims of diffinction, an elevated genius, extensive knowledge, and unwearied application. It is very probable, that the young lawyer's fuceefe will, at first, fall vaftly thort of what he might premife himfelf in the warmth and hear of his imagination; and there is no doubt, but that many persons of considerable merit have funk into a supineness and dispondency, merely for want of being early countenanced and taken notice of: but let us beware of following their example, or of thinking, because we do not rise so soon as our vanity or impatience might expect, we shall never rise at all; steady perseverance overcomes all obstacles; and if we never appear in court without being prepared pared to shew the extent of our knowledge and closeness of our application, we shall one day or other have an opportunity of displaying those talents to advantage.

By pursuing these steps, there is little room to doubt but that; fooner or later; our endeavours will be fuccefsful; for the present possessors of business must, in a course of years, inevitably yield, either to the violence of short and sudden illness, or the lingering decays and infirmities of old age. And as these, after having played their parts with reputation, must make room for us, so must we, in our turn, make room for others; which reflection alone will be fufficient to warn us, that we are to confider our profession as an honorary, as well as lucrative employment ; and that at the same time we act as lawyers, we must never deviate from the rules of honour or the duties of morality.

marchy for want of being early counternameed and taken notice of a but let us beware of following their transple, or of described something of white constitutes we thall never rileist all a feedy perfeverance overcomes all philoclas : and if we sierer appear as court within theing pre-